had cut open to take the flesh out of, he set it up in the lodge.

The weather growing something cold, and the wind pretty sharp, he begins to think of providing for his antelopes against the approaching winter, so makes a lodge for them at the backside of his kitchen, with sticks, which he drove into the ground, about two feet from the wall, and then bends them about three feet from the ground, and sticks them in the said wall, and smaller branches he interwove between them: He shuts the front, and covers the top, leaving both ends open for the antelopes to go in at; then lays dried grass for them to lie on. Thus having dug up a considerable quantity of roots, and being stocked with salt-fish, both dried and pickled, he was pretty well provided for his cattle and himself against the ensuing winter, which proved much like the preceding one, only not quite so stormy.

The succeeding spring having awakened slumbering nature, and revived what the preceding hard season had caused to droop, he first goes to view his small stock of peas and beans, which he found in a very promising case; so whilst the weather was fair he falls to clearing a spot of ground to set them in, as they increase.
